Comments:

Seems positioning ahead of Monday's report picked up considerably after lunch today. The close in both corn & beans does reflect the general sentiment of the market. Neutral/friendly old crop corn, bearish new crop, neutral friendly old crop beans, and bullish new crop. I have to continually remind myself that the accuracy of the planting intentions report could be a far cry from the final numbers they give us at the end of June. I've said it a thousand times, if there's any entity that should be able to predict acres with the utmost accuracy it should be the USDA since they have a direct connection to all FSA offices. Sometimes, though, it seems they throw darts at a board. General fresh news was absent again today. At least when we get the acreage number behind us the market will begin to focus more on weather. As of right now there's only two areas of significant drought in the Midwest. These being NW Nebraska & SW South Dakota. Traditionally not high production areas. A significant percentage of the rest of the cornbelt is in abnormally dry to moderate drought situations. Nothing in our extended outlooks is pointing to a dry spring. Have a nice evening.
